HKUST TAKES 'CONTROVERSIAL' ACTION TO FIGHT VIRUS THREAT

In an email sent yesterday, the Hong Kong University of Science and Technology (HKUST) said people who visited the Clear Water Bay campus regularly, such as students, staff, and university residents, including their family members and domestic helpers, and even frequent visitors and contractors, would have to get a jab or be tested every two weeks to obtain an Electronic Campus Access Pass starting from September. Only children under the age of 12 are exempt.

But Dr Leung Chi-chiu, a respiratory medicine specialist who has frequently called for the tightening of anti-pandemic rules, questioned the university's move. "The Covid-19 vaccines have still only been approved for emergency use in Hong Kong, and there are some legitimate health concerns, especially for young people who are at a higher risk of having heart muscle inflammation due to vaccinations," he said.

Leung said a blanket policy risked depriving students of their educational rights, and suggested a partial one, such as only covering medical students who had to go into wards and face patients, might be more measured.

Other tertiary institutions, such as the University of Hong Kong, Chinese University, Lingnan University, City and Baptist universities only require students living on campus to take a jab or be regularly tested.
